What we do with your money

Giving children a voice

Jean-Baptiste and his sister Alexandra live in the suburbs of Dakar, the capital of Senegal. They love their country because the people are friendly and hospitable, and the climate is pleasant. The sea air allows them to withstand the heat of the sun. Their mother works hard to make sure they have everything they need. But their living conditions remain difficult.

They acknowledge that they are very lucky to have a place to live and go to school every day! They know that some of their classmates cannot attend school because they don't have a birth certificate. When these children were born, their parents did not know that they had to be declared to the town hall so that they could have an identity and a nationality.

Jean-Baptiste and Alexandra are also aware that other children are not protected, either because they have to work in poor conditions or because they are subjected to violence.

Both children are members of an association called EDEN (Education and Child Development). It protects children and allows many of them to attend school even if they do not yet have a birth certificate or if they have special needs. In general, EDEN is working to ensure that children's rights are better respected.

In their daily work, adults active in EDEN involve children. They believe that young people and children are important people who can fully participate in improving their own lives and those of their peers.

Jean-Baptiste and his sister chose to be a part of the club in their neighbourhood where there are only children.

They meet on Wednesday afternoons to discuss issues that are important to them, such as dropping out of school. If they know that a child is not going to school, they can talk to an adult about it to try to understand the reasons and then help them.

Sometimes, they organize awareness-raising activities to inform the inhabitants of the neighbourhood about children's rights. They create sketches, songs or plays to talk about topics that concern them.
